The Most Common Myths About Metal Roofing

Is a metal roof way more expensive than shingles?

Corrugated metal panels (like our ABM Panel) often cost about 20% less per square than asphalt shingles. Before you get too excited though, remember that a metal roof requires more accessories like screws and trims. With the accessories included, a metal roof can cost about the same as a shingle roof on an average home. And considering that our panels come with 40-year paint warranties (with many metal roofs even lasting over 100 years with proper maintenance), the savings over time makes metal a smart choice.

Is a metal roof only for farms or industrial buildings?

Gone are the days when metal panels were only used to clad outback chicken houses and factories. Many homeowners are discovering the beauty and cost-effectiveness of modern-day panels that come in a wide gamut of high-performance colors. Today, a quality metal roof will actually increase the beauty, energy efficiency, and resale value of a home, making it a wise investment that will last for years to come.

Choose metal!

Long-Lasting. Energy Efficient. Beautiful.

Does a metal roof take longer to install (costing more in labor) than shingles?

Every roof is different. If we're talking about a very complicated roof with lots of peaks, ridges, dormers, and valleys, then shingles might be faster to install and cost less in labor than metal roofing. But a standard gable roof will enable an experienced crew to install metal panels significantly faster than shingles, saving you labor costs.

Is a metal roof fireproof?

Steel is non-flammable. But that is not the same as fireproof. Steel is a conductor of heat and cannot block an intense fire because heat can transfer through the metal to the combustible materials inside. So while a metal roof is not guaranteed to stop a fire, a falling ember that lands on a metal roof does not set the roof ablaze like it would if it landed on shingles. This advantage can mean the difference between minor cosmetic damage to a roof's paint and the total loss of a home. Considering this fact, it is not surprising that the popularity of metal roofs is increasing in states where forest fires are a frequent danger.

Is a metal roof heavier than shingles?

No way. In fact, a metal roof is often over 50% lighter than asphalt shingles. So in most cases no additional framing is needed where shingles were used previously. Many roofers will even install metal over top of shingles to save you removal and disposal costs. (Be sure to check local building codes for possible weight limitations.)

Is a metal roof more hot in the summer than shingles?

While asphalt shingles absorb radiant heat, the physical properties of steel cause the radiant heat from outside (during the summer), or inside (during the winter) to bounce off metal roof panels. Meaning, your AC doesn't have to work as hard when the heat is trying to get in, and your heating system doesn't have to work as hard when the heat is trying to escape.

In addition to that, most colors of metal roofing are better reflectors of radiant heat from the sun than asphalt shingles are. But some colors are even better than others as shown by the Solar Reflectance Index (SRI). Compare white-painted steel with an SRI of 83% to a light-colored shingle that might only be 22% reflective.
